Well, I was wrong about the scanning job and it seems that the printer is just a sound card and it has all the functionality that a sound card has. I know there are some software that simulate the drivers but they all seems to be very old, no newer than 2003, and unstable. So instead of buying a new printer I decided to use the printing functionality of the printer. I have found some good info but I am still struggling with the configuration of the printserver. It says that the printserver support a maximum of 3 printers? because it just keeps telling me that a printer is "trying to connect". And yes, I tried to find the answer in the web by searching for this problem but with no luck. So if anyone knows how to resolve this... Please help! A: The printers are actually supposed to not do that. Some older drivers and printer-drivers, including the new one you have, will try to print for every connected printer. That's the way they used to do it. The newer and better versions of that driver and printer-driver now know which printers they are "supposed to" print for, and so do not connect to every printer. But the driver still knows what they did it for before, and just goes through the motions even if nothing is supposed to happen. Go look at the printer's webpage or the web-site for the driver and printer. They should have instructions for that. If you don't have one of those sites, or if you do, but no instructions, then you might just be able to find them in the manual that came with the printer, the printer's driver installer, or the printer's documentation for the model of printer in question. I'm actually not sure where they come from, and not too sure where I've seen them. But they will have instructions on how to "undo" what they did. If you do not have the manual in question, or the instruction manual, then you probably need to contact your computer store, whoever sold you the printer, or the printer's maker. They should be able to get you the information. If you do have the manual, or instruction manual, but no instructions, then again, probably just contact the printer's support or maker. They will likely want to see the manual (usually). Then again, it might be as simple as just updating the driver, which is what the printer's support or maker
