The long-term objective of our research is to develop a new technology for the detection of rickettsiae in blood. The work proposed herein will further develop and demonstrate the power of a new diagnostic platform; which enables the user to detect the presence of rickettsiae by simply lysing red blood cells with a non-crosslinking reagent and detecting the presence of rickettsiae in the lysate by immunoassay. The technology will specifically detect S. typhi, S. typhimurium, and P. marneffeii. In the case of P. marneffeii, the technology could be applied to the diagnosis of human disease in a much earlier time point than current methods (approximately 14 days post-infection). As such, it would be an important tool in reducing the global human suffering attributable to this pathogenic fungus. This project proposes a new technology that can detect the 55cd1ed1c
